Windows 8.1 is on the horizon, and Microsoft is on the verge of releasing its major new operating system. Though it's still in the making and features are still being worked out, Microsoft has been ahead of the curve on most key features, and has already implemented some interesting new features into Windows 8.1. Tablet support Perhaps the most significant change to Windows 8.1 is support for multi-touch. Support for multi-touch has been in Windows 8 for some time, and was mainly reserved for multi-touch technology, such as the Surface Tablets. Windows 8.1 will be the first version of Windows to support touch and pen input alongside the touch screen. Microsoft has already provided the basic use cases, but the company has provided guidance on best practices for using the technology. For example, it is safe to work with multiple touch points, or "touches", simultaneously. It is not recommended to use two touch points to move a pointer, but Microsoft says you should only have one touch on the screen at a time to make things easier. It's not yet clear how this will work on mobile Windows tablets, but the company has already begun to experiment with this in the new Windows Phone. Windows 8.1 will also be the first version of Windows to support handwriting (or pen input) with Windows 8. The technology seems to be identical to handwriting in Windows Phone, and it is expected to work with just a smartphone, and will work without any input on mobile Windows tablets. Microsoft already has a line of smartphones running Windows, and the company announced at the start of the year that it was working to bring Windows Phone to other devices, including tablets. Google entered the tablet market with the Nexus 7 last year. Microsoft is expected to release its own tablet at around the same time, and the Surface tablets have been a top selling product for Microsoft since its debut. The Surface Tablet can use the Windows Store to download and install third party software to 09e8f5149f
